What is grief?

Grief is the process of responding to a loss and it can affect all parts of your life. It is not just an emotion in the context of death and dying.

With a cancer diagnosis, grief can happen shortly after diagnosis, during treatment and beyond.

There are both tangible and intangible losses.

Tangible losses may include losses or changes to your:

- Body parts (e.g. loss of body parts, disfigurement, loss of hair)
 - Function (e.g. ability to work, or engage in normal activities)

- Finances (e.g. loss of job, change in financial security)
- Relationships (e.g. change in roles in relationships or intimacy)
- Possessions (e.g. accommodation, housing)

Intangible losses may include losses or changes to your:

- Independence
 - Identity
 - Time and energy levels
 - Future events, goals and plans that you once looked forward to
 - Career aspirations

How can grief impact you?

Grief is a very individual process. There is no right way to grieve.

Everyone's grief is shaped by their gender, personality, family and cultural background, and life experience.

Grief is not the same as depression nor does it occur in phases or stages. There is no set timeline for grief.

After a loss you can experience a range of intense emotions.

These may include:

- Shock
 - Disbelief
 - Guilt
 - Blame
 - Numbness
 - Anger
 - Resentment
 - Irritability
 - Longing
 - Sadness
 - Relief
 - Anxiety
 - Panic

How can grief impact your thoughts?

Grief can lead to:

- Rumination where you go over and over your loss
- Difficulties concentrating
- Difficulties making decisions
- Difficulties remembering things
- Confusion

Grief can feel like you are losing control of your mind.

Common thoughts associate with grief may include:

- "I'll never get over this"
- "I can't cope"
- "This is not fair"

How can grief impact you physically?

Grief can lead to:

- Changes in sleep patterns
- Changes in appetite
- Dizziness, headaches, muscle aches, nausea
- Pain
- A generally unwell feeling
- Exhaustion and fatigue

What behaviours are often associated with grief?

- Crying
- Keeping busy or the opposite – loss of interest in usual activities
- Snapping or feeling impatient with others
- Talking about the loss or avoiding it
- Withdrawal from friends and family

What can you do to help with the grief process?

Although the sadness of loss may never go away completely, most people will cope with grief and loss through the support of their family and friends and not require counselling or medication.

- Look after your physical health through exercise, a healthy diet and by limiting alcohol
- Establish a routine
- Give yourself time to grieve
- Spend time with people that you find supportive and share with them how you are feeling. Talk about the loss. Avoidance can lead to feeling isolated.
- Keep a diary. Write down how you feel about the grief and loss. Write down your memories and observations
- Give yourself permission to do things that you enjoy or that can distract you. Start doing pleasant things again. This might include doing some gardening, going to a movie, doing a puzzle, playing a board game, eating out or any other activity that you enjoy

For the loss of a loved one:

- It might help to write a goodbye letter. In the letter you might want to share: how saying goodbye makes you feel, your memories, what you miss, and how you will remember them
- Share your memories of your loved one
- Join a bereavement group

Finding a mental health professional

You can begin by speaking to your General Practitioner (GP). GPs can discuss your emotional concerns with you and can link you to supports in the local community, such as a psychologist or social worker.

You can also speak to your cancer clinician. Most cancer services have a range of psychological support options including psychologists, social workers, psychiatric nurses and psychiatrists. If this isn't available at your local health service, ask them what support is available in the local community.

You can find a local Psychologist with a referral or a mental health care plan from your GP.
